This invention relates generally to earth boring bits and more particularly to a rotary rock bit that includes diamond impregnated inserts mounted on one of the bit legs. Rock bits have been used for many years to drill bore holes for oil, gas and other minerals. Recent advances in bit design have brought about the development of rotary drill bits that have three cone cutters mounted on the bit body. Each cone cutter includes a number of cutting elements, typically polycrystalline diamond compact (PDC) cutter, mounted to the cone surface of the cutter. PDC cutters are diamond cutting elements having cutting faces or surfaces of a superabrasive material, such as polycrystalline diamond, formed on a substrate material. The use of cutting elements with superabrasive materials has provided a significant advance in rotary drill bits, allowing for longer bit life due to the more effective removal of hard formations during drilling operations.

However, the manufacture of superabrasive material on an economical and commercially viable basis presents a number of difficulties. For example, cutting elements made entirely of polycrystalline diamond may exhibit relatively poor wear resistance when exposed to 1cdb36666d
